However, 5 years later, body weight had increased by 5 kg over the preoverfeeding level. Fluctuations in fat mass were greater than those in fatfree mass. The younger twins gained approximately twice as much as the older twins in the late recovery period, a difference attributed to the late phase of growth in body mass in the former. Upperbody fat was reduced at 4 months of followup study, but was increased in the late recovery phase. All blood values were normalized in the postoverfeeding periods. A withinpair resemblance was generally observed for the changes noted in the recovery periods, but it was more striking when variations between preoverfeeding and 4month or 5year values were considered. We conclude from these observations that there were no persistent effects of exposure to the overfeeding protocol over the expected ageassociated increases in body mass, body fat, upperbody fat, abdominal visceral fat AVF, and metabolic variables predictive of risk for common diseases in individuals of normal body weight and with no family history of obesity.

The intrapair resemblance suggests that the genotype contributes to the alterations observed in the recovery from overfeeding and in the ageassociated changes.
